In 1863, John W. Witt of Heber was given a contract to supply oats to the stations as far east as Green River. Under this contract, companies of men with teams and wagons periodically set out from Heber to supply stations. There was work for everyone with a wagon. According to John Crook:

This was the beginning of good times for Heber. Plenty of money rolled in. Grain kept raising until it reached $3.00 a bushel for oats and $5.00 for wheat. Merchandise was high also. Stoves were from $150 to $200 each. Sugar and nails were $1.00 a pound. Factory and prints cost $.50 to $1.00 per yard. A good wagon cost $300 and everything else in proportion.⁴
